To Whom It may Concern,

I applaud any efforts that result in reducing carbon emissions. I regret not having reviewed the discussion paper as I have only just heard about it.

To further support the overall objective of lower transport related emissions, may I suggest incentives are also put in place for transport alternatives - specifically bikes and e-bikes.

I own an e-cargo bike and can attest to it's suitability for addressing a wide range of transport related scenarios, reducing my need for other transport types significantly.

Cycling also (as research confirms) contributes towards greater personally health - both physical and mental, and would therefore have positive implications beyond carbon emissions.

In terms of incentives, beyond purchasing related incentives (for bikes / e-bikes) safer roads, such as protected cycleways, would also drive positive adoption of cycling as a transport alternative - and reduce costs associated with cycling related injuries caused by motor vehicles.

Best Regards,
Adrian
